Daniel Boone: American Pioneer and Explorer

Colonel Daniel Boone (1734-1820) was born near Reading, Pennsylvania. Boone founded the first US settlement west of the Appalachian mountains. A frontiersman[1], Boone explored the Kentucky wilderness from 1769 to 1782. He travelled down the Ohio River, and trapped furs[2] in the Green and Cumberland Valleys.

In 1773, Boone brought a group of settlers to Kentucky. As they travelled over the Cumberland Gap, Boone's oldest son, James, and five other members of the party were killed by Native Americans. The settlers went home to North Carolina immediately; Boone and his family spent the winter in the Clinch River Valley, then returned home.

Judge Henderson, a businessman who wanted to settle the rich land of Kentucky, organized the Transylvania Company in order to buy land from Native Americans. Boone negotiated the price with the Cherokee Indians; their agreement is called the Watauga Treaty. In 1775, Henderson sent Boone and 28 settlers across the Cumberland Gap into Kentucky, along what is now called the Wilderness Trail. Boone built a fort on the Kentucky River in what is now Madison County.

Boone was captured by Shawnee Indians in 1778 and was given up for dead. After more attacks by Native Americans, he brought more settlers to Kentucky in 1779, including Abraham Lincoln's grandmother and grandfather.

Boone was elected to the Virginia legislature[3] in 1781. In later Indian attacks, his brother Edward and his son Israel were killed. These attacks started a major campaign against Native Americans by George Rogers Clark.

Boone lost all of his land claims[4], and spent the rest of his life moving - he lived in Ohio, West Virginia, and Missouri. Boone's book, called "Adventures," detailed his exploits[5] and capture by the Shawnee Indians; it was published in 1784.
